This invention relates to medical endoprotheses, and more particularly to coverings or liners for intraluminal stents that are implanted into blood vessels, ducts, or any other tubular body organ, such as the esophagus, trachea or colon, or other selected anatomical locations. This invention is particularly directed to stents which are implanted into blood vessels to reinforce them or to prevent stenosis. This invention relates to liners for coverings or stents, and more particularly to a liner having an elastically deformable inner layer and an outer layer that covers the inner layer and is substantially inelastic. More specifically, the liner is an intraluminal endoprosthesis that is implanted into a vascular structure and has both inelastic and elastic regions. In some embodiments, the liner is a wire mesh stent. In the vascular system, the liner is normally collapsed and inserted into a catheter which is then advanced intraluminally to the stenosis and advanced to the open body lumen. There, the liner is radially expanded to contact the stenotic area. More specifically, the liner expands in length and thickness in the direction of the catheter as it is advanced through the body lumen. In one embodiment, the inner layer of the liner is elastically deformable to be elastically compliant or deformable. Vascular stenoses, which are treated with the liner, commonly are treated with a balloon catheter. A stenosis is the narrowing of a blood vessel resulting from a vascular injury that restricts the amount of blood flow in the affected area. When the symptoms are severe, the stenotic process is clinically referred to as occlusive. Stenotic lesions can be classified by the type of cells and tissues that line the vessel; e.g., by the type of cell that lines the blood vessel. A fatty plaque, such as atheromatous plaque, is a build-up of cells, including highly inflammatory cells, such as lymphocytes, macrophages, and certain types of mast cells, that are concentrated in vascular lesions, such as in coronary arteries. A fibrotic plaque, such as fibrocalcific plaque, is a combination of normal cells and tissue, such as connective tissue, chondrocytes, and certain types of differentiated cells, and a great deal of collagen, which are also concentrated in these lesions. The fibrotic plaque is solid and not fibrocellular. The fibrotic plaque generally

What's New in the Photoshop CC?

Q: Why a bad or defective product was shipped? This could be considered as a rephrased version of this question. I have recently bought a used mobile phone from an online retailer. The phone is run on Android 6.0, and the seller has claimed that it is a "new stock" and that it is not a "faulty unit" (I don't have the seller's phone). However, some other used phones, like HTC One M7 (also Android 6.0), are mentioned on the seller's site; so I suppose that the seller might have used this title out of laziness. Also, recently I have come across the term "stock". From the Cambridge Advanced Learner's Dictionary (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008): 1. A new or existing item of something, such as an order, that has not yet been processed by the shop. So if the phone was sold as a "stock", meaning an unprocessed one, then the seller has not made any "error" in shipping it to me. If anything, he made a mistake in his packaging. Is there any valid reason why the seller can claim that his product is a "stock" and that it has not been subject to any "defects"? A: The seller has a different meaning for the word stock. It doesn't mean "the product hasn't yet been processed by the shop". It means that the product was preordered from the factory and put in inventory so that they could ship it right away and make sure to get you the product. For example, if someone has a shipment of apples in their orchard, but they don't yet know how many apples they'll need for the week, and they have enough apples that they know they can safely ship them the next day, that's a stock shipment. The reason the seller can claim that the product was new to him is because he is specifically not claiming that it is defective. For example, if a vender sold you a new iPhone for $999, and then he shipped it to you with a broken screen, he would be claiming that it was defective. If he were to sell it to you on a "stock basis", meaning it was something he'd already received from the factory, he would not be claiming that it was defective. He might not be able to provide a guarantee (or any kind of warranty
